

It sounds like another attempt to stop a better idea from evolving because someone's wallet is involved. Maybe traditional radio's day is about over. Let the better service have its day. Eventually someone will make one better than XM. It could even be the traditional radio people. For the time being though, there will still be plenty of people who do not want to pay to listen to the radio.